The NSPCC has published a framework for national and local decision-makers and commissioners. It sets out actions across five levels of society - children, parents, communities, universal services and local government - to help stop child neglect. Informed by evidence from new NSPCC research on universal services, the framework focuses on taking action before the need for intervention from children's social care at a Child in Need or Child Protection level.

The NSPCC has published a report drawing on the views of health visitors, school nurses, GPs, midwives, teachers, early help practitioners and young people exploring what help is currently provided by universal services to tackle child neglect, what the barriers are to providing early help and what stakeholders' views are on how services can be better supported to provide early help. It sets out a model for early help for neglect in universal services and makes recommendations for what is required to get there.

To inform an upcoming campaign, the NSPCC is surveying a range of professionals about the provision and accessibility of mental health support for children who have experienced abuse or neglect. It is well documented that CAMHS services are stretched, but less is known about the range of therapeutic support for children who have been abused. Please fill out this 5 - 10 minute survey to help us as we campaign to ensure that every child who has been abused has the support they need.
