Top tips on working with adults who have experienced CSE

There is a risk of sexual exploitation being ignored by adults' services by Ruth Hardy on April 25, 2017 in Adults

Community Care

Child sexual exploitation is one of the areas of most concern for local authority children's services, following the publication of the Jay and Casey reports into the response of statutory agencies to CSE in Rotherham. But adults' services will also have safeguarding duties towards some victims and survivors of abuse, and should be prepared for this.

Understanding wellbeing after child sexual abuse

The NSPCC's Impact and evidence series features a blog by Dr Debbie Allnock, Dr Camille Warrington and Dr Helen Beckett, from the International Centre: Researching Child Sexual Exploitation, Violence and Trafficking at the University of Bedfordshire, talking about new research that highlights the importance of learning from those affected by sexual abuse. The research will create opportunities for young people who have been sexually abused to share what they think would help improve their wellbeing. The research aims to: map the mental health and wellbeing support needs of young people who experience sexual abuse in adolescence; learn more about how young people define the concepts of mental health, wellbeing and resilience after abuse; and develop a more child-centred theoretical framework for thinking about these issues.

Making noise – short animation

The University of Bedfordshire in partnership with the NSPCC has released a short animation to help practitioners gain insight into the feelings and perspectives of children affected by child sexual abuse in the family. The film puts the focus on children and young people's voices for positive change after sexual abuse, and was produced in partnership with a group of young people who advised on the Making Noise research project and its dissemination.

Abuse of older people: the responsibilities of community nurses

Professor June Andrews

British Journal of Community Nursing 2017 22:5, 224-225

Abuse of older people is a problem that community nurses are well placed to challenge. However, it often arises in situations that are complex and difficult to handle so community nurses need to know as much as possible about how to recognise it and what they must do when they are concerned.
